If East Jerusalem's Arab-language press is sometimes subjected to government censure, it remains nonetheless the most independent in the Arab world. One of the most influential is the daily Al-Fajr, whose Editor-in-Chief, Hanna Siniara, has been active politically in the Israeli-Palestinian debate.

Seen here are several members of the editorial staff: Hiam Abasi, Maha Wasfire, Talal Abu Afifi, Ismain Abu Taha and Ishaq Awsasi.

Along For The Ride

In a city with no subway, no streetcars and a relatively low percentage of car owners, Jerusalemites depend heavily on buses to get around. The most action is at the city's Central Bus Station, where most local and inter-city Egged busses converge. Unlike in most countries, Israeli bus drivers aren't big on formality. No uniforms, little in the way of courtesy, music blasting from the front of the bus and a style of driving that is often, how should we say, adventurous. Seen here, Raviv Amram, 54, Yehuda Jeretz, 49, Masud Shloni, 54, and Michael Martiziano, 41.
